A common sight in the California and Mojave Wastelands and used as a standard sidearm by the New California Republic Army, this model of 9mm autoloader handgun was manufactured in vast quantities before the Great War. Its light weight, ease of handling, and common ammunition makes it a popular choice for personal defense, or as a backup weapon. However, the sturdy design doesn't lend itself as well to modifications as other common weapons.

Utilizing an ergonomic, metallic skeleton design with a free-floating barrel, the anti-materiel rifle is a bolt-action, high-caliber precision weapon intended for use against materiel and hard targets. The weapon is designed for use at long ranges and should ideally not be fired while standing up due to the heavy recoil. Rare and highly sought-after, these guns are ideal for dealing with things like deathclaws, the larger radscorpions, and other sizeable threats... so long as you've got time to set up the first shot.

Designed for use as a crew-served weapon, the automatic grenade launcher was intended for use against a variety of targets ranging from infantry and light vehicles to fortifications and other materiel. The sheer weight of the weapon and bulk of the ammunition limited its versatility, until the advent of Power Armor. Since then, many units were converted for use on foot, rather than from a tripod.

The broadsider is a naval cannon that has been modified with a chassis that allows for it to be a portable weapon. In addition to having a portable frame, the firing mechanism has been altered to include electronic triggers to avoid the traditional fuse. The cannon requires traditional loading however, with cannonballs being loaded directly into the muzzle.

Originally referred to as "Gatling's battery gun", these weapons resemble an old-fashioned version of a minigun, with the rotating barrels operated by a hand-crank rather than an electric motor. Naturally, this means that it has a slower rate of fire than its more advanced counterpart, but the weapon is no less functional for its old-fashioned design.

AMMO	DAMAGE TYPE	DAMAGE	FIRE RATE	RANGE	EFFECTS	QUALITIES
Plasma Cartridge	Energy and Physical	4	4	Medium	Burst	Two-Handed, Gatling, Inaccurate

An evolution of plasma gun technology, the gatling plasma is a rare, potent, and costly weapon to use. Like smaller weapons of its kind, it inflicts damage through a combination of both physical impact and thermal transfer, and like other gatling weaponry, it inflicts this damage via a rapid-firing collection of rotating barrels that spray huge numbers of shots at the enemy. The relative scarcity of plasma cartridges, or extremely rare plasma cores, and the rate at which this weapon consumes ammunition, means that keeping the weapon supplied for use can be a full-time job.

Weight: 8, Cost: 500, Rarity: 5

AMMO	DAMAGE TYPE	DAMAGE	FIRE RATE	RANGE	EFFECTS	QUALITIES
Fusion Core	Energy	6	1	Medium	-	Two-Handed, Debilitating

This advanced energy weapon generates intense blasts of microwave radiation. While it won't irradiate you—microwaves are non-ionizing radiation—it can cause intense burns as whatever is hit by the blast is heated up from the inside, boiling the water in your cells. And metal is little protection: the microwave blast can't effectively be dispersed by metallic objects, which heat up, produce electrical sparks, damage delicate circuitry. While extremely rare, these weapons provide a serious advantage when used against heavily armored targets.
